Chapter 13 Summary

Canada experienced the Industrial Revolution after Confederation. The introduction of machines resulted in factories, which changed how people worked and where they worked.

Workers organized unions and workers started striking for better wages. Canadian women entered the work force. Women organized the suffrage movement to gain the same rights as men. Women gained the right to vote provincially and federally.

New technologies such as airplanes, radio, and automobiles were introduced. WW1 was the first industrial war. Factories made guns, tanks, airplanes, and other war goods. After the war, factories produced consumer goods.

The Great Depression caused the economy to slow, factories to close, and people to lose their jobs. After the Depression was WWII. Work became plentiful as war required industrial production again. After WWII, Canadian resources such as wheat, oil, coal, lumber, and potash were in demand.
